Nobody cares

The phrase "elephant in the room" refers to an obvious yet awkward or difficult issue that people deliberately avoid or ignore.

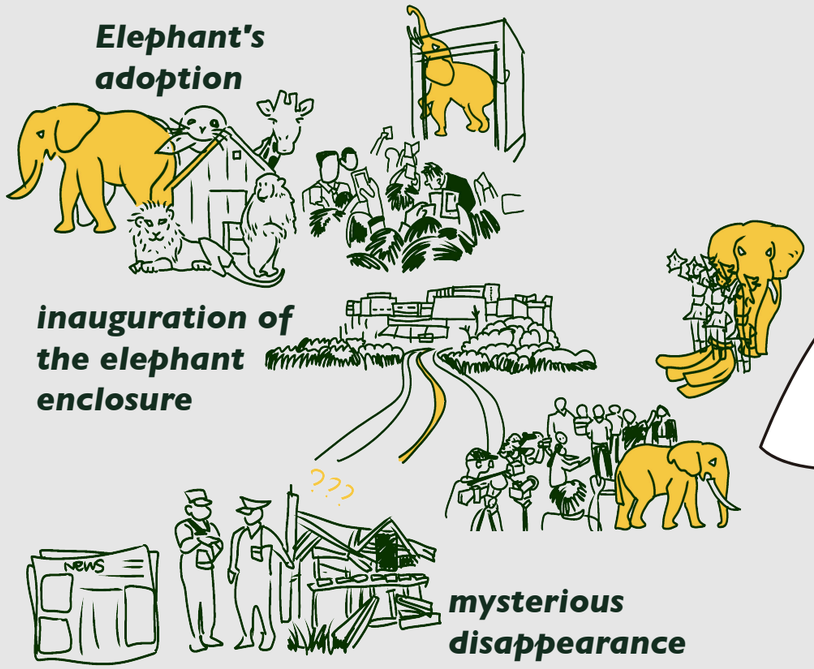

When ritual becomes a shackle, do we still need this performance?

Inspiration

In Haruki Murakami's short story The Disappearance of the Elephant, the elephant itself is never truly regarded with concern. It remains an exploited "tool" or "symbol", utilised to serve the public's demands and purposes rather than being respected as a living being.

This disregard permeates the narrative throughout

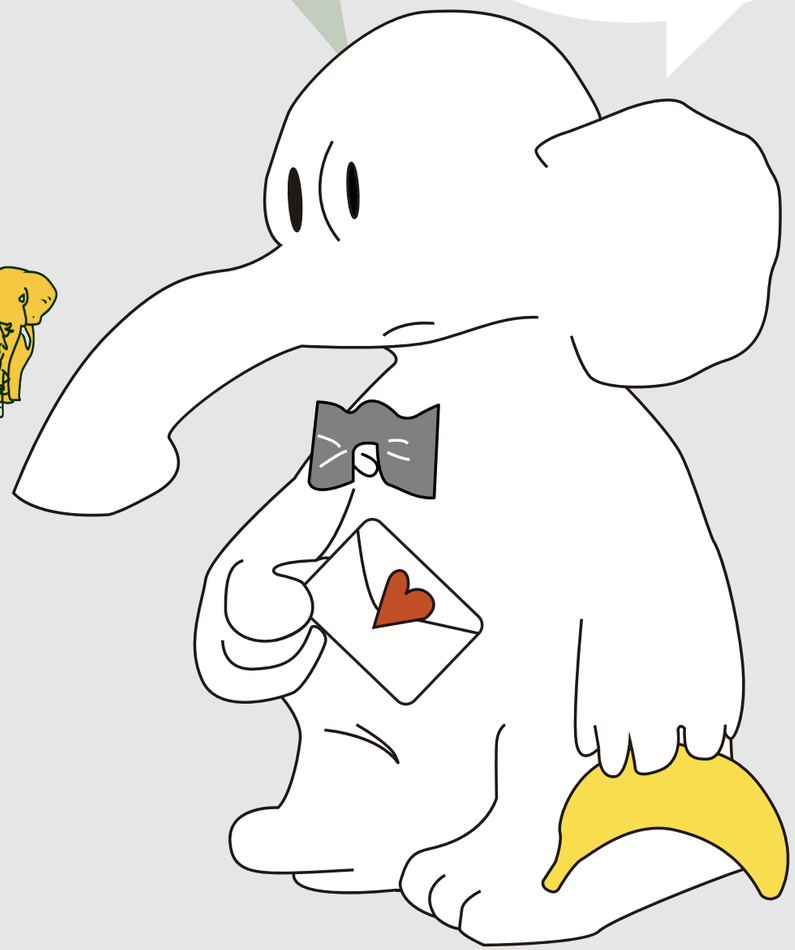

*—whether before the elephant's adoption, during the inauguration of the elephant enclosure, or following its eventual mysterious disappearance—revealing human behaviour as consistently self-serving and utilitarian.

The reasons for the "newlyweds being neglected" in Chinese weddings

Weddings are now boring, most of the wedding form of the same. In particular, it is mentioned that the new couple if the wedding is held for the face of the parents, in this case the new couple is more likely to be ignored, because the wedding is more to meet the family and social expectations, rather than the personal wishes of the new couple.

The blocking game at the reception of the bride and groom may make the bride and groom feel pressurised and thus neglected in some way.

Weddings are more like performances, with the couple feeling awkward and the audience on stage anxiously waiting for the meal to start

Guest roles varied depending on the relationship with the couple, but overall weddings may lack a deeper focus on the couple, especially when the process is similar, and the couple may be more easily overshadowed by the standardised process.

The “Nonego Ritual”

Observation

"The elephant in the room" refers to those vast yet overlooked issues. Living in China, I have observed through participation in events such as funerals, weddings, corporate annual meetings, and birthday parties that attendees and audiences often display an attitude of indifference toward the "protagonist" of the occasion, sometimes even harboring clear personal social agendas.

Project concept

In these significant "Nonego Ritual", people tend to focus solely on their own immediate interests, showing apathy toward the main figure of the event. To some extent, humans are as pitiable as elephants—manipulated by social norms, expectations, and the interests of others, they become relegated to a passive existence. Though ostensibly the "protagonists" of their own lives, they often find their roles diminished or even stripped away.

The stroyboard and sketch

The elephant and the bride had prepared early for the once-in-a-lifetime grand wedding ceremony, awaiting the arrival of their distinguished guests. Alas, it seemed nobody cares the couple in question, instead being utterly absorbed in posting their own “show-off” moments onto social media.

The "ZOOCHAT" APP

Returning to the lounge, the elephant opened the social app 'Zoochat' to find all the wedding guests beaming with self-importance, arrogantly boasting and chattering away. In the photos, the couple had been reduced to a blurred mass. Is this really my wedding? The elephant felt a pang of doubt.

Nobody cares.

Ultimately, he posted to his social feed with the caption: Nobody cares. Today we're the stars of our own show.

Alongside it, the elephant posted photos with his bride on "ZOOCHAT".
